

Long distance moving

Contributed by Mike
Sunday, 25 November 2007
Last Updated Sunday, 25 November 2007

Long distance moves are permanent and chances are you would not be back to the old place in near future. This has one good side and one bad. Let's look at the bad side first. You won't get the opportunity to leave anything at the local store with the mover, as you won't be there to collect it. So you need to pack and move a lot of things to the new place. Now, the good side; while your long distance moving, you get a chance to get rid of your unused and unwanted belongings that have been there at your home for long. And you could not find a good reason to throw them out.

In case of international move, you may also consider selling off some of your furniture and utilize the money. Even after throwing something out and selling some of your belongings you will find a lot of things to be moved to the new place. To ensure all the things are shifted to your new home safely, you may let a long distance mover to assist you. Long distance movers generally have centers in all big cities and states. International movers also have branches in different countries. Taking help from a professional long distance mover would be a wise decision on your part.

It's the distance that determines whether a move is long distance or local. The cost of moving considers two parameters generally. The weight of your belongings and the distance you move them. Now you may wonder that do the long distance moving companies weigh all your appliances, utensils and furniture separately to find the cumulative weight of your possessions. Well, that's quite impossible. What they do is, they tag a price on your belongings based on the bedrooms you have in your apartment. In short, you may need to pay charges for things per bed-room.

Long distance movers also help you unpack and arrange your things at your new apartment. A professional and reputed long distance mover would pack your possessions properly with blankets and other shock-absorbing materials. They will take special care of fragile and glass materials so that you get your things intact.

It's always advised to take snaps of your things before you hand them over to movers. Also ensure that the boxes are tagged properly. Be present at the spot when the movers put labels on your boxes. Don't forget to keep urgent legal documents with you. Also inquire if you need to submit any paperwork so that your things do not get stuck at customs clearings. Finally, make sure that the long distance moving company has your new address correct. Now set off for the new place, you have ensured a smooth long distance move.